CHILDREN INCREASING

One Jumped From Window

Rather Than Be Reprimanded by Parent. New York—(L. N. S.)—Angela Scherguisepti, il years old, because of being disciplined for some infraction of household rules, jumped from a fourth-story window in her home and died from the injuries thus received.

The girl's sister said their father was not strict in enforcing discipline, but not strict in enforcing discipline, but gave the children a slap or two when not strict in enforcing disciplins, but save the children a slap or two when things went wrong.

The normal child soon forgets an injury or slight. Perhaps little Angelia if the same so dreary, so leaking in the average joys of childhood, that parental guidance in small matters made it too intolerable.

The case is brought to mind by the annual report of the Save-a-Life league. If you read that report, which was to the effect that the increasing number of suicides among children is alarming, well, you probably rushed to see if Young Hopeful had a dagger concealed in his bootee, a desperate diary in his private desk, or a bit of bichloride under his bib.

The report says that in the past six months there were 225 suicides among children. That would seem it be a truly alarming number. Among these the average age of the boys was 16 and that of the girls 15.

But Justice Franklin C. Hoyt, of the children's court, does not find among there is considerable comfort in his view of conditions.

"I suppose," said Justice Hoyt, "that there are possibly two or three cases a year in which children, who have tried to kill themselves, are brought in here for a rebuke.

"I do not believe there is any so-called wave of child suicides awaping the country. There are certain types of children, emotionally unstable, who become excited over correction by parents for a fancing slight or disgrace in school.

"But the immediate cause of the attempt at suicide is nearly always agence.

or children, emotionally unstable, who become excited over correction by pasents for a fanciful slight or disgrace in school.

"But the immediate cause of the attempt at suicide is nearly always something which produces sudden resentment in the youngster's mind.

"Ew long-suffering children, the victims of cruel or careless parents, try to kill themselves. Deliberate self-destruction is confined largely to adults. "Child suicide is not the outgrewth of despair. Quick-acting, sensitive children are more apt to express resentment by swallowing poison than the more phiegmatic type.

"Ink and lodine seem to be the favorite poisons of the juveniles whose attempt to cease living have brought them under my jurisdiction. And their remorae is terrible after they recover. They beg their parents to forgive them for the trouble and grief they have occasioned, and it generally proves to be a severe lesson in self-control.

"I do not think parents need neglect to correct and discipline their children through fear of contributing to the so-called 'suicide wave."

"The child who wants to actually die by his or her own act is happily rare."

Against that opinion, however, the Save-a-Life league says:

"Nothing should cause more real alarm than the suicide of children. In our own country, with its boasted institutions for human betterment, during the last six months eighty-eight boys and 137 girls committed suicide, an increase of fifty over last year's report for the same time.

"These terrible facts urgently call for strictly enforced laws to suppress the sale of all poisons and frearms."

He Sang She Fell-They

He Sang, She Fell; They Eloped, He Skipped

She, so the story goes, assented, but before they left the man is alleged to have gone to the husband's bedroom, forced open a box and extracted $225.

The woman packed her treasures and trinkets and together they journeyed to Bristol, where they stayed at a hotel for the night.

Next morning the man went out into the town catensibly to get a shave, but he never returned.

The woman was unable to meet the hotel bill, and a search of her traveling bag showed that her watch and a treasured trinket had vanished.

She explained her predicament to the
